Blue throat Visible Essay £ o, range and habitat HÅj two subspeciesÅ £ P. c. cumanensis and P. c. grayi. Praça, cumanensis (Jacquin, 1784) Å © found from the Guianas, the Orinoco River in Venezuela and Southeast of Colombia south to north (Amazon) Brazil and Southeast Peru. There are possibly in northern Bolavia, intergrades with the largest P. c. ç, (Pelzeln, 1870) (of Gray Jacutinga), who continues by the north and central Bolavia, Mato Grosso (State of Brazil), and from the north and east of Paraguay. [2] This species occurs locally in forests: in colony and Venezuela, hospital plain forests (occasionally as high as 1,000 m) if fluid Å £ oeso or not, and riparian forests. It especially favors the edges where the forest meets the open earth or a river. [3] [4] Description The blue-throat guan tubing is described as "eccentrically 'prior' (Ptil)" but "considerable". [3] The mother is 69A cm (27 in) in length, including the neck and tail, Å £ - so long, the neck and disproportionately thin and small head, the tail disproportionately large. Most of the plumage is black with a green blue-green glossa in Cumanensis, Olive in Grayi. It has a large white spot on each wing, white spots on the wing and chest shelters, a white stain on the eye, and a white or buffy-white (and upper neck in Grayi). Both subspects have a white or white-shaped white crest; in Cumanensis is felpudo and almost solid of color; In Grayi is more hairy, and the axes of feathers are black, appearing as stretch marks. The bill is blue-babe on base and cobalt blue at the tip. Both subspects have blue naked meat in the throat with an acácia in Cumanensis and a caruncle hanging on Grayi. The legs are red. [2] [3] [4] During the pallet of reproduction is noisy. At dawn, it gives a "piping" call of 6 or then armed-tall, slow slow whistles, "slightly upwards in the field, pÅjÅ¼EEEE, pÅjÅ¼eeEEEE, pÅjÅ¼EEEE, A | ", reminiscent of the antbird back in scale. Your flight display, at dawn or during the day, includes "2 rappish asa-palms (often almost inaudible), then 2 buzzing rattles with wings," the second apparent to reverse the first as in Baralha cartons (Colo'mbia and Venezuela). In other stations is usually silent. [3] Behavior This spy occurs in pairs during the poca of reproduction and larger groups, like many like 12, at other times. It walks with agility or wiring with the help of your wings in the forest canopy or sub-canopy, especially in trees with flowers or fruits eating. For cross-links set out with fast wingbeats and then slides, giving another wave of wingbeats if necessary to keep your height. Where not hunted is quite common and easy to see. [3] [4] Little is known about his reproduction. In colo'mbia has been observed in the creation of conditions in February and put eggs in May. A nest was built of branches in the thick vegetation on the canopy and contained three white-yellowish eggs. [4] Taxonomy instead of a species, the Cumanensis pipile is sometimes considered to be two subspects of pipile pipile, [2] [3] [4], which is a name restricted to the trinidad tubing Guan. Authorities disagree, as it does the recent evidence. A genetic study suggests a separation, [5], but free crossing between this spy (grayi) and the throat red guan tubing in Eastern Bolivia, creating a "haved swarm," suggests a node.
