Inside this article 21 questions or "twenty-one questions" is a spoken parlor game and conversation starter game. It encourages creativity, critical-thinking, and general fun. This is a game that is most commonly played between two people. And the two players play when trying to get to know one another. The original 20 questions game originated as a parlor game where one player thought of an object. And the other players asked 20 questions to deduce what the object was. With the main player responding "Yes" or "No" to the prompts. In the 1940s, the game became a popular radio panel quiz show, "Twenty Questions." That was the first broadcast on Saturday, February 2, 1946. By the Mutual Broadcasting System from New York's Longacre Theatre. This game inspired the "21 Questions" game that we know of today. Playing the modern 21 questions game revolves around the two players choosing 21 questions to ask one another. And then prompting each other for truthful responses to the 21 questions. It is considered a conversation starter game. And intends to begin an intellectual or thoughtful prologue between the two players. How to Play "21 Questions" the Conversation Starter Game To play the modern version of 21 questions, each player should pick 21 questions. The players should take turns prompting the other player with the questions. And responding with honesty. The players can choose to ask the same questions to each other or choose to ask unique questions. Both are acceptable versions of the game. The game is complete when all 21 questions have gotten asked. And with each player prompting a response. Players may choose to "pass" on the question up to two times. Most commonly, this game is played amongst couples who are aiming to learn more about one another. This can be played on a first date or when having a private evening together. Small groups can play this game by using a ricochet or round-table style format. One person starts the round and the people in the game have to answer the questions. The person asking is considered the "game head." Playing with two players "Player A" and "Player B" can play together. "Player A" must ask, while "Player B" responds. And once "Player B" has responded, "Player A" must respond, too. An alternative is to have "Player A" ask all 21 questions. And have "Player B" respond to each question. Then the roles are reversed and "Player B" can ask "Player A" questions. Point system There are no "right" or "wrong" answers when playing this game. And there are no points. The players should play at leisure, responding with an articulate response. Groups playing this game should rotate the role of the "game head." The player asking the questions. Playing this game helps develop a bond between friends, family, or new connections. Coming up with your own questions When coming up with your own "21 questions," consider asking interesting questions or personal questions. Something that might act as conversation starters. These questions should be unique, personal, and make the other person think. For example, "What's your biggest guilty pleasure?" or "When was your last serious relationship?" Be creative. "21 questions" is one of the easiest and most fun games to play with friends. And can act as a way to spark great conversations, leading to knowing people on a deeper level.
